How does this year deliver your curriculum intent?

The History department's A Level course is structured to help widen students' experiences and develop qualities of perception and judgement by providing a sense of the past, an awareness of the development of differing values, systems and societies and the inculcation of critical yet tolerant personal attitudes. A study of the Tudors (1485-1603) will give students an understanding of the workings of government and parliament, the influence of religion, and changes to society and culture that are still relevant today. A study of early 20th century Russia, meanwhile, gives students a greater understanding of the stark cultural and political differences of one country to their own.
